After six months' labor the democratic congress has brought forth the democratic tariff. The measure, although greatly transformed enroute since its original introduction, has been put through by practically a strict party vote, and will go on the statute books as performance of the platform pledge upon which the democrats went into power.

Japan's method of assimilating Korea and the Koreans furnish several useful lessons for nations engaged in that line of benevolence. Korea as a distinctive name has been wiped off the map. Since 1911. it is konwn as the Peninsula of Chosen. For some time preceding the annexation foreign correspondents and foreign residents at Seoul severely critcised Japanese methods of dealing with the natives and ridiculed the insufficiency of Japanese administrative ability. Japan now makes answer to these criticisms by sending abroad a bulky official report of the governor general of Chosen for the fiscal year ending with March, 1912. The report is printed in English and is illustrated with excellent half-tone pictures of industrial and agricultural activities and colored maps. At the outset of annexation the imperial government set aside a donation fund of 79,000,000 yen (about $15,000,000), the income of which is being dispursed for educational, industrial and agricultural purposes. Up to the end of the fiscal year covered by the report 134 public common schools were established and subsidies were granted to 313 private schools.
